

Flowers and Ashes

Louise Bryant

1915

The swaying streetcar bulged with human freight,

A gust of sand blew up the narrow street
And caught it as it whirled with giddy gait.

The souls within sighed wearily, the heat
Was so intense it hurt their tired feet,

Their tired eyes, and hands, and tired souls.

It was the hour when the workers pause at last
And seek those murky, fetid, loathsome holes

They call their homes; if thus their lot be cast.
Poor wrecks of lives! Poor ships with broken mast!

A woman sat beside me and her face

Was lined with care and sorrow, as if the years
That she had lived and loved and hept her place
Among the workers, had been a thing of tears;
A tragic life of agonies—and fears.

And in her hand she held some flowers,

Old-fashioned flowers, like our grandames knew.
Their fragrance was so sweet, I minded distant hours.

I touched their dear, soft faces for I knw
I'd think of other flowers wet with dew.

We jogged along street after street and then

The woman spoke, "For my man's grave," she said
And then was silent. When I looked again

On her pale cheek there burned a spot of red
"For twenty years," she mused, "my man's been dead."

"Yes, I raise flowers for his grave. You see

He loved the flowers and the soft green frass
And it is lonely where he sleeps and he...

Must miss me, want me, so I always pass

The little plot at evening...But alas!
 Death comes so slow, with lagging steps...that pause...
 Before they reach me." "Why," I said, "It would seem
 That you could find another love...another cause...
 To strive for...Do you have no babes...or dream
 No dreams, nor see the future all a gleam—
 With promise?" She clutched the flowers, her thin form
 Shook with emotion. "Because I had two
 When he fell off the painter's Scaffold...and was torn...
 Right out of life... I knew not what to do...
 I worked, I begged, I stole. And God, he knew,
 I was so faint and sick in that foul air,...
 My babes were hungry and my life was dust.
 ...I gave my body for them...They were fair
 And young—with trustful eyes—I felt I must
 Do all things for them,...even those of lust.
 The law came down upon me with a din,...
 It took them both away—my babes—it said...
 I was a thing of shame and marked with sin
 And babes were pure in heart and must be led
 In whiter ways than mine,...who was not wed!
 And I grow flowers in a little box
 High in a window in a dark old street...
 Where children never come, to smile at phlox
 Or marigold or primrose...There I meet
 Only the wretched...still my heart does beat—
 For Death must very old have grown, he does not
 Knock upon my battered door or lurk
 Beside my flowers." We rode on.—Thus have you wrought,
 Oh, gloating "men of God" who bow and smirk,
 ...Call you this white soul black?...
 Is this your holy work?

The Anarchist Library
Anti-Copyright

Louise Bryant
Flowers and Ashes
1915

Retrieved on March 20, 2012 from en.wikisource.org
Originally published in Mother Earth, Vol. X, no. 4, June 1915.

theanarchistlibrary.org